Worright graduated from Woodrow's Hall of Fame. He is the author of Six Books, but he is known above all for his 2006 book, The Infilare Tower: Al Qaeda and The Road to 9/11. A quick bestseller, the impending tower was awarded the book of J. Anthony Lukas's book, the 2007 Pulitzer Prize for the general non-fiction and is often cited by media experts as an excellent source of basic information on AL Qaeda and the attacks of 11 September. The title of the book is a phrase of the Koran: "Wherever you are, death finds you, even in the impending tower", which Osama bin Laden has mentioned three times in a video game speech seen as indicated for the hijackers of September 11. Among Wright's other books are remembering Satan: a tragic case of recovered memory (1994), on the false memory case of Paul Ingram. On June 7, 1996, Wright testified to the hearing for forgiveness of Ingram. Wwright also co-disclosed the screenplay for the film The Siege (1998), who told the story of a terrorist attack in New York City which led to reducing civil liberties and rounding Arab-American. He wears tortoise glasses that always slip off his nose, and has a shy habit of laughing and looking up and away. He seems to never know what to do with his long limbs, so when he relaxes he has a way of crossing his arms and wrapping his legs around his knee and ankle, like screws. When Jim Rabie and Ray Risch are together, they have some quality Laurel and Hardy. Both are hardcore readers and love working on cars. That Thursday afternoon, Rabie was exhausted. He suffers from narcolepsy and usually takes two laps a day; in fact, that illness, and his propensity to fall asleep at inopportune moments, had caused his retirement from sheriff's office, in 1987, after fourteen years department. Since then, he has worked as a lobbyist for the Washington State Law Enforcement Association and as a lieutenant governor of the local Kiwanis meetings in different cities. The speech at the dinner table, of course, was about their friend Paul Ingram. Both men knew him well; Rabie had been the campaign manager for Ingram\(\hat{A}\) s when he made a lost bid for the state legislature in 1984. Rabie had just called Sandy to ask if he could go on and I don't know what to say. In his experience as a sex crime investigator, he discovered that a lot of terrible things could happen in a family without being recognized, even by the victims. For this reason, he lobbied to change Washington state law so that the perpetrator of a sexual offense against a child could be sentenced to seven years instead of three. (Later, the law was amended again, to allow charges to be filed for three years after the victim recalled a crime. Rabie and Risch did not know at the time that one of them was a suspect, but while they were talking, Ingram was across the street in the interrogation room, producing further memories of the harassment suffered by her children. That morning, Iulie had taken their faces from a photo confrontation and had described an incident in which, during one of the poker games, Rabie would enter her room, rape her and cut her with a knife. When they finished chatting, Rabie went to Kiwanis' meeting and then went across the street to return a projector to the sheriff's office. He borrowed it from the Crime Prevention Bureau, headed by Ingram. Since no one had ever asked Rabie to return the keys to the office when he retired, he opened the back door and walked in. It was past 7:00. Rabie was wearing his Kiwanis red blazer. In the hallway he saw Tom Lynch enter the office shared by Schoening and Vukich. Rabie stuck his head in it to say hello. The detectives seemed scared. "What are you doing here?" asked Lynch, "Returning this", said Rabie, "I'm a little surprised to see you here at this late hour," "He wasn't even as surprised as they were." "May I ask a guestion?"
